Traveling in your own country is the best way to learn about it.

Since time immemorial, traveling around the world has always been considered entertaining and educational at the same time. However, some people claim that visiting their own bearings is far more beneficial when learning about it, whereas others disagree.

Personally, I am sure that traveling around one's country is indeed the best way to learn about it. Initially, when touring around the place you live, you come across a raft of groups of people who have different culture and customs but still speak your language. Thus, you have an opportunity to get to know more regarding the cultural groups of your country. Secondly, you get a possibility to see a lot of historical sites, which eventually enriches your knowledge of the history of your country.

However, there are people who embrace the idea that traveling in your own country has nothing to do with learning about it, as you only touch upon the touristic side of the place and miss some unpleasant things, hence the reality, in which people really occur.

Nevertheless, I cannot agree with those people's opinion. When traveling around your own country, it is only you who is in charge of guiding your tour. What is more, since the people around you speak the same language, you get an opportunity to talk to them and learn about the problems they live with in advance.

To sum up, I am still certain that traveling around your bearings is the most educational way when learning about it, as you develop your cultural and delve into the historical knowledge.